circumstances people don't like, taking a look at the reasons people quit their jobs, get fired, what causes drug problems, attitudes, successful supervisory systems; what kind of recognition people want or what kind they get. One suggestion: Think about a teacher whom you admired...what was it about that circumstance that inspired you. In other words, think about personality types you like, what motivates you, what turns you off. Another dimension to think about concerns the benefit packages. Medical benefits, profit sharing, liberal vacations, use of a company car or equipment, work schedules, salary are just some of the determinents of selecting a working environment. As mentioned previously, the job seeker should think and research with an open mind to avoid the mistake of merely confirming something already known about or believed.

These ideas hardly cover the entire job search quest, nor were they meant to. The choice of combining these three tasks is the person's own responsibility. No one is responsible for amount of choice the job seeker can choose from other than the individual. To combine what one wants to do with where he or she wants to do it and under what circumstances is like winning the prize that everyone wants to win.
